Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: ...impossible to stay here," said Daniele Glauro, supporting himself against a shop door; "the wind will carry us away." "Go down; I will overtake you. Only a moment," the master cried to him, leaning on the balustrade, covering his eyes with his hand concentrating all his soul into the effort of listening. Formidable indeed was the voice of the gale in that gathering of centuries now turned to stone; it alone dominated the solitude as in the time when the marbles still slept in the bosom of the mountains, and wild grasses grew round the birds' nests in the muddy lagoon islands, long before the Doge was installed in the Rialto, long before the patriarchs had led the fugitives to their great destiny. Human life had disappeared; there was nothing under the heavens except an immense sepulchre in the hollows of which that one voice re-echoed, and that voice alone. Its unaccompanied song, its lamentation that had no hope, commemorated the multitudes that had become ashes, the dispersed pageants, the fallen greatness, the numberless days of birth and death, the things of a time without name or form. All the melancholy of the world passed with that wind over the outstretched soul. "Ah, I have grasped you," cried out the joy of the triumphant artist. The entire line of the melody had been revealed to him, was henceforth his, was immortal in his spirit and in the world. No living thing seemed more living to him than that one. His own life yielded to the unlimited energy of that sonorous idea, yielded to the generating force of that germ capable of infinite developments. He imagined it as steeped in the symphonic sea and unfolding itself through a thousand aspects until it reached its perfection. "Daniele, Daniele, I have found it...
